If you've got an upcoming drug test for marijuana, though, we always advise to plan for the maximum amount of detox/abstinence time possible. In other words, if the calculator estimates that THC will be in your system for 7-10 days, yet you know you don't have to take the marijuana test for 14 days, then go ahead and wait that entire 14-day period (if possible) so you can be on the safe side with regard to passing the test.

To close, we'll go ahead and reiterate the fact that this THC detox calculator SHOULD NOT be used as a guarantee that you'll pass an upcoming marijuana drug test!

It should probably go without saying that if you're trying to determine how much weed is in your system, a calculator is not the surest thing in the world to provide the most accurate results. Even experts in the field who do this type of stuff on a daily basis claim that it is extremely difficult to gauge exactly how long THC will stay in any one person's system for, as there are just so many variables to take into consideration (age, weight, frequency of use, diet, exercise routine, etc).

At the end of the day, the most foolproof way to pass a marijuana drug test is to simply abstain from smoking weed for as long as possible! We know that's probably not what you wanted to hear, but let's face it – sometimes you just gotta suck it up and do what you gotta do to make things happen.
